From the Chroniclers

Unto the populace of Three Rivers, comes greetings from the Chroniclers:

We would like to thank the entrants of the Barge cover contest. We had a difficult time deciding whether to be serious or silly. As you may have noticed, silliness won. However, we put the second place entry on the back so it could be seen just as well as the first place entry.

Congratulations to the winner, Lord Ranulf de Whimsey for capturing the true spirit of Crown Tourney. Alana de Franval's entry was just as fine in a more serious vein.

In service to Three Rivers,

Carolyn Buxton Edouard d'Aubigny

Surviving an Arts & Sciences Competition

Christian d'Hiver

In July, Calontir held an Arts & Sciences Championship, and many local groups are following suit and holding competitions in particular A&S fields at their events as well. Arts & Sciences Competitions are strange animals, and they can bite the unwary. That is, many gentles enter their first competition unaware of how the contests work, receive inexplicably poor scores, and -once burned- stop entering contests. Some folks drop out of the arts altogether. This is a shame, because A&S competitions can be fun if you get a handle on them. In this article, I'd like to offer some explanations and some guidelines for participants in a Kingdom-level competition.

There's more than one reason for entering contests, and you'll do much better if you know beforehand which reason you choose. Do you want to put the results of your months of hard work on display for the populace? Do you want to score well in the competition and maybe win its prizes and honors? Perhaps you're just entering for the fun of it. Or maybe you want to get serious, constructive criticism of your best work: the competition score sheets have an area for Judges Comments that might give you that criticism. There are other good reasons for entering competitions as well.

Whatever your purposes, entering a competition is usually a straightforward process. When you arrive at the event, you should ask the folks at the Troll Booth to point you towards the person in charge of the competition. You find this person and hand her your entry and its accompanying documentation (we'll talk about that in a later issue). In categories where the product of the art of science is a physical object (say, a bottle of wine or a pair of leather gloves), the contest judges are kept in the dark as to who made each entry, to encourage fairness. In this case, you have to fill out an entry form asking about the piece. The form has your identification stapled shut inside, so that the folks in charge can get your entry back to you in case you forget to pick it up later in the day.

Then you sit and wait. Your entry probably goes on display, so that the populace can Oooh and Aaah over it for a few hours. Eventually, the judges shoosh everybody away from the display and get to work. Afterwards, you pick up your entry along with the judge's comments. The winners are usually announced at feast or at court that evening, and often a scroll or small prize accompanies the thunderous applause.

Things are a little different in a Performing Arts category (like the ones I usually enter). In this case, the judges usually call you off to some corner of empty room where you take your turn in performing. Theses showcases are almost always open to the public; almost always, nobody shows up, and you end up performing for the judges and your competitors. There's no attempt at keeping the entries anonymous (how could there be?), and sometimes the judges just come up to your afterwards to give you their comments.

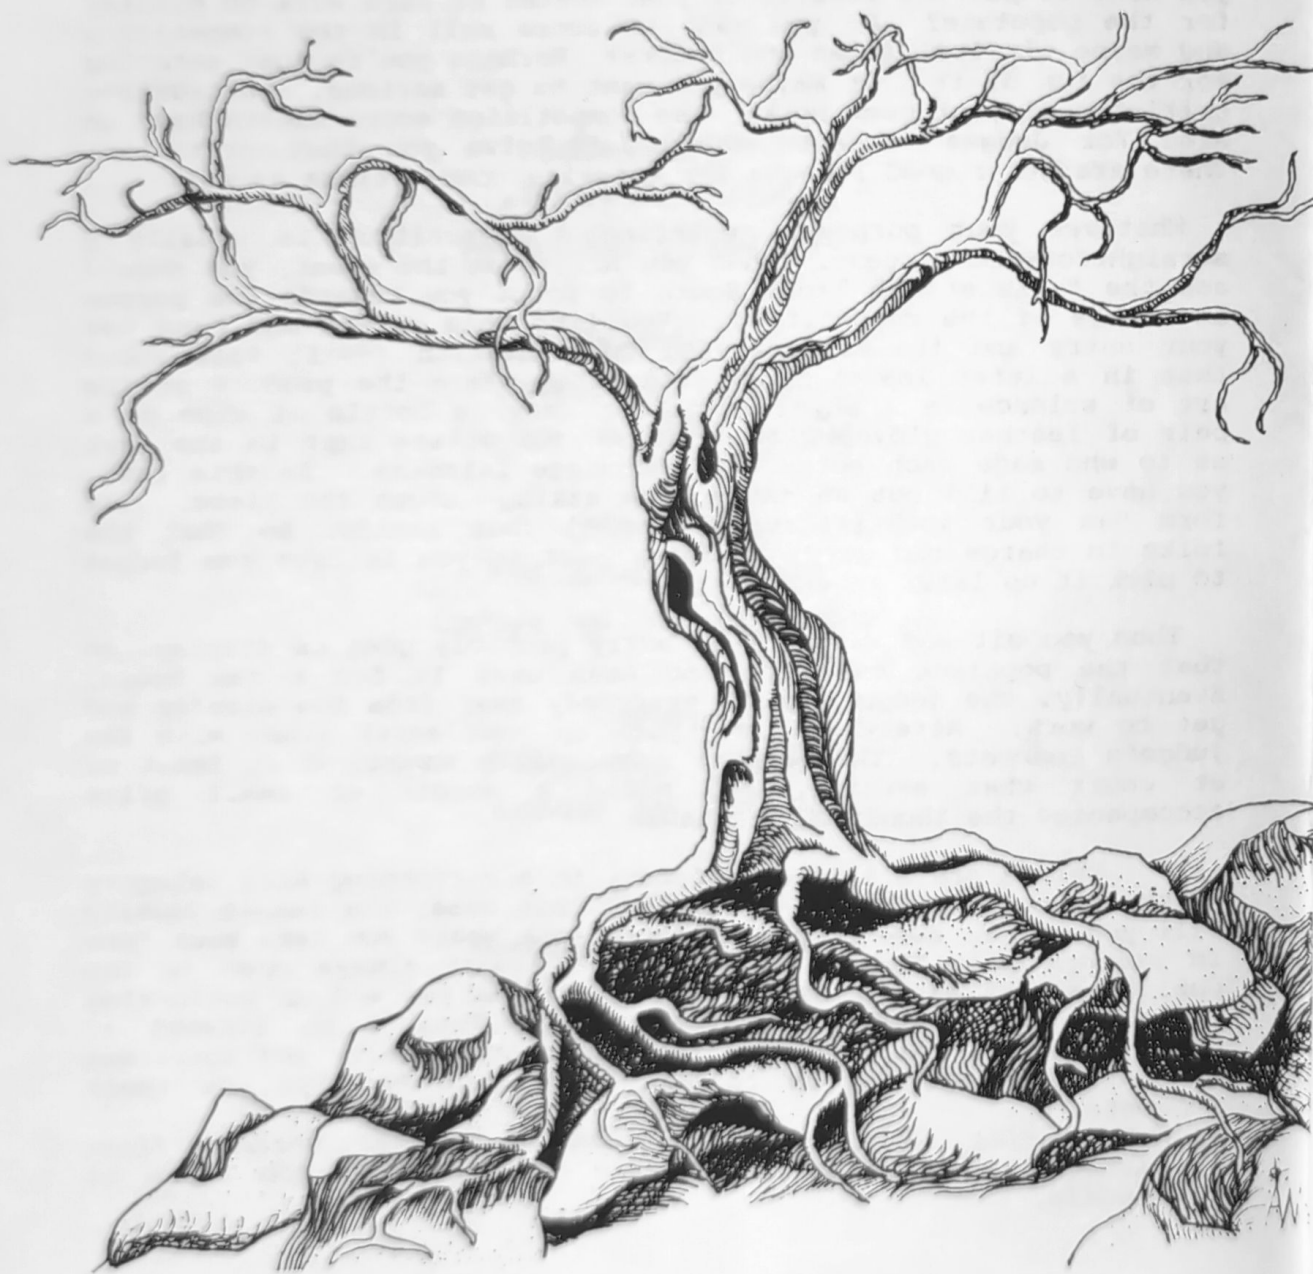

This series of articles is from an earlier version first published in The Shadow Knows, the newsletter of the Shire of Shadowdale.
